It is my philosophy that all students have the ability to learn and their can be no limit or restrictions placed on individual students learning ability. When put in the right environment and subjected to the correct teaching style a student can reach endless heights in education. I believe in John Dewey’s pragmatic view on education and growth. You should keep growing and learning to get the most out of what you have.

If a student has a learning disability, it needs to be documented and implemented into lessons for that particular student. Students should be on good behavior at all times while learning. It is important for students to grow as citizens as well as intellects. The two coincide with each other as it has been shown in research that students who exemplify good behavior in class tend to produce better results in the classroom assignments. Therefore, providing an environment that promotes good behavior also promotes intellectual growth.

Depending on what type of a learner the students are, the assessments should vary. Some students should have oral assessment, while others should have portfolio assessments. It is important that as an educator, I realize what type of learners my students are and provide them with the proper type of assessment. Many students are not good at taking written tests, so a written assessment would not justly examine where that student is in their educational growth.

Creating lessons and providing activities that are important and interesting to the students allows for greater growth in a students learning ability. When a student has an interest in a subject or topic they will focus and learn more than they would about a topic they do not care about.
All students develop at different paces. Some students develop slower and others faster, but no matter what their speed, restrictions should not be placed on anyone. By giving my students support and complying with their educational needs I hope to allow for more as well as enhance their growth and learning during their educational experience with me.
